

We searched Canada's best livable cities last year with the goal of helping readers identify communities where they could thrive. With so many options to choose from, we wanted to consider other factors that define a city, from the weather to amenities to the local economy. The top priorities we considered: livability across the board. If you can afford to live in a city, would you want to?

There are several key livability factors, including safety and cost of living. While you might not want to live in a city with high crime rates, you also don't want to pay too much for rent and utilities. We also considered the quality of life, including the availability of parks and public transit. We also considered the local economy, including the availability of jobs and the cost of living. We also considered the weather, including the availability of sunshine and the amount of snow.

In total, we evaluated 145 communities based on 50 variables, which spanned 10 categories such as Transportation, Amenities and Quality of Life. We ranked the top 20 most livable cities based on their overall scores. Each city was ranked based on its overall score, with the highest score being the most livable. We also ranked the top 10 most livable cities based on their overall score, with the highest score being the most livable.
